Q & A

Q How often should I change my oil?

A Regular oil should be changed every 3,000 km, synthetic oil every 5,000 km. Be proactive about checking your oil; once a month is good maintenance practice.

Q What should the tire pressure be on my car?

A The tire pressure should always be set to the tire manufacturer's suggest PSI (pounds per square inch) pressure specs. The specs can be found on the side of your tire. Properly inflated tires will give you better gas mileage, tire wear, and overall handling of your vehicle. .

Q How often should I check my anti-freeze?.

A Checking the anti-freeze as well as all other fluids is very important for proper vehicle maintenance. Once a month is good practice.

Q How long do spark plugs last?

A That really depends upon the type of spark plugs that are in your vehicle. Vehicles 15 years old or older are more likely to have standard plugs with approximate life expectancy of 3.000 - 10,000 km. Newer vehicles up to model year 2000 are usually platinum-tipped, lasting approximately 15,000 km. Lastly, some 2001 and newer models come with iridium-tipped plugs which could last up to 90,000 km.

Q What is the primary cause of tire damage?

A Although there are many things that can cause tire damage, improper inflation is the main problem we see. Always keep a tire pressure gauge in your vehicle and frequently check the pressure of all tires. .

Q Why are my brakes making noise?

A If you hear a grinding or squealing sound when the pedal is applied, you probably need new brake shoes or pads. Brakes shouldn't make any noise as they operate. Even if the actual problem turns out to be something minor, the only save assumption is this one; noisy brakes are unsafe brakes. Postponing service is unsafe and could raise the cost of repairs later. If your brakes are making nose, get them inspected or serviced right away. .
